How to Boost Sales in the Produce Department

The produce department in a grocery store is the first opportunity to set the tone of the customer's shopping experience. A well-designed and inviting produce section can greatly improve the overall feel of the store. To increase produce sales, it is important to optimize the produce department for sales and reflect the desired image of the store. It is important to understand the customer's preferences and carry the products they want. Prioritizing the appearance of the produce by keeping it fresh and well-stocked and using attractive display tables can engage customers. Inviting customers to try new and unique produce options can also boost sales. A well-designed and attractive layout that is easy to navigate can also improve the shopping experience. Lastly, ensuring that staff members are knowledgeable about the products can elevate the customer experience. Read the full article

How to Reduce Produce Shrink

Produce shrink refers to loss of inventory or products that go unsold in a grocery store, specifically in the produce department. Produce shrink can happen for a variety of reasons including theft, damage, spoiled produce or lack of sales. The average produce shrink in 2018 was 5.3% which can have a significant impact on a store's bottom line. To reduce produce shrink, store owners should think holistically and consider proper training of employees, sourcing and managing desirable produce, ordering appropriate amounts, and storing and rotating produce items appropriately. Additionally, having an easy to access and inviting produce department can boost sales and reduce produce shrink. Read the full article
